Conference Overview

Today the world is a more chaotic place to live and thrive than ever before, Organisations are not insulated as unprecedented nature of challenges create enormous shifts for business and industry at large. In recent times businesses all over the world have had to shift gears and lanes in response to Covid 19 pandemic, fragile food and energy shortages, inflation, Ukraine conflict etc.; All these came in a short span of time and with input costs rising exponentially across industries world trade and economy are in extreme stress.. In short it is called a VUCA environment which is characterised by volatility, uncertainty, complexity, and ambiguity. These developments continue to impact all sectors and operations and businesses need to be prepared for the ever-changing new normal to tackle the challenges of a VUCA world.

As business leaders strive to navigate the current VUCA environment they would do well to fundamentally reimagine their strategies and business models. A McKinsey Global Institute analysis estimated that 14 percent of the global workforce will need to be reskilled entirely, and 40 percent will need partial reskilling to continue with their current occupations. However one thing is certain that to emerge successfully from the current crisis, organisations will need to nurture their employees' digital, cognitive, social and emotional and adaptability and resilience skill sets. Also as a part of their talent building strategies they will need to focus on training employees to effectively operate remotely, innovate, and adapt,

As "new ways" of business become the norm, organisations that fail to sharpen their teeth on upskilling now will be limiting their potential to do so at scale in the future. Those that choose to constantly evolve, stay ahead of the curve, have a strong vision, take risks, prepare well, and come up with innovative ideas are here to stay. The key characteristics to build a resilient business in the complex environment are adaptive performance mindset of leaders and degree of agility. Hence a lot more focus needs to be given to resilience and business continuity planning to make it easier for businesses to soften the blow, and be poised for an accelerated growth.
